

Labor's Response to Industrial Growth

3rd Hour Essay

I am going to be talking about the Labor Response to Industrial Growth. The laborers responded in strikes and some other ways.

The Knights of Labor founded that secrecy interfered with the organization's public work and inhibited its response to critics. The Knights of Labor as a "purely and deeply secret organization." It drew heavily on Freemasonry for its ideas and procedures. In the meetings they talked about the work conditions and they decided if they wanted to strike or not. They also talked about the pay and if it was good pay or bad pay.

A strike is when a group of people protest the rules or law of the object or system they do not like. They were sometimes arrested and beaten. One famous protester was Gondi. He did not eat for a long time to protest about what ever he wanted to protest about. Another type of protest is a strike. When people strike they do not work and sit out in front of the work place or a factory. They also hold up signs and chant a phrase. If they were striking on a store then they would say do not buy from here or something along those lines.

The workers also demanded for higher pay. They wanted to get some benefits like medical and vacation pay. Some workers thought that some on the working conditions were bad and dangerous.
